About the Conference

Scientific Social Work, as perceived today, is the result of prolonged and gradual evolution in the era of social services. A remarkable change is evident in the present times both in the concept and scope of social work. The initiation of services started with the era of social service, charity and reform. It gradually moved towards scientific social work, as is being practiced today.

It is expressed that social development implies a substantial investment in social services. The concept of social development has two dimensions which are interrelated and interdependent too - the first dimension is of the capacity of people to work for their own as well as for society's welfare, and the second dimension is of the alteration of institutions to suit to the needs of people, realized through improvement in relationship between needs and means to attain them.

The essence of social development, according to Gandhiji, is of welfare of all – Sarvodaya.

At abstract level and from social work point of view, social development aims at creating a new society wherein living conditions of people are improved and major breakdowns or disasters are mitigated. Development of Human Resource, especially of skill development of young professionals would pave way for economic development as well as social development. The issues also include removing rural, urban and regional imbalances, eco-development, rural development, programmes for Universal literacy, comprehensive healthcare services and improved quality of population. This is possible only through active participation of people. Dynamic profession like social work needs to focus its attention especially on issues mentioned above for a healthy society and for sustainable development. A two-day national level conference is proposed to deliberate on issues of social development.
